Botao Cao, A Film Producer Transforms Film Into Art with "The Correct Way of Youth"

Botao Cao's journey with "The Correct Way of Youth" began when he identified the script's potential. With a deep understanding of what makes a good story, Cao saw the commercial value and emotional depth embedded in the narrative.

His experience in the industry, combined with his lifelong passion for film, allowed him to recognize the script's unique qualities. Drawing from his academic background at Shanghai Normal University and further studies at Weber State University and Johns Hopkins University, Cao has developed a keen sense of both Chinese and American film cultures, enabling him to craft stories that resonate across audiences.

One of the critical decisions in bringing "The Correct Way of Youth" to life was polishing the script. Originally centered on a poor boy aspiring to be a soldier, Cao transformed the protagonist, Jian Tang, into a complex character—a wealthy playboy determined to forge his path as a warrior, despite his privileged upbringing. This shift added layers of depth to the character, making the story more relatable and engaging for a broader audience.

Cao's eye for talent led him to cast renowned actor Zheng Wang as Jian Tang. Known for his roles in films like "Ip Man" and "The Disguiser," Wang brought the duality of Jian Tang's character to life, balancing the carefree playboy with the resolute warrior. His performance has been lauded as one of the highlights of the film, proving Cao's casting choice to be a critical success.

During production, Cao faced unforeseen challenges, including adverse weather conditions that threatened to derail the filming schedule. However, his quick thinking and collaboration with Director Liu ensured that the film continued without significant delays, turning potential setbacks into opportunities to enhance the film's authenticity.
