focused on financial literacy and mental health well-being for college and high school athletes, today announced the availability of key mental health resources to high schools and universities that aims to address the recent NCAA mandate requiring universities to offer crisis management services to their student-athletes. According to a recent University of Michigan School of Medicine study, approximately 33% of college athletes struggle with mental health challenges. That number jumps to over 70% when an injury is involved, with suicidal ideation occurring. Currently, less than 15% of college athletes seek treatment for these issues. According to the NCAA, the mental health and well-being of student-athletes is a top priority.

“Mental health well-being is the most important yet overlooked component of any successful athletic training regimen. We’re confident Teladoc Health will provide meaningful mental health education and resources to ensure positive mental health well-being,” exclaimed Steven Simmons, Co-Founder and COO of NILENT.

“We are honored to collaborate with NILENT and offer mental health services to student-athletes,” said Dr. Vidya Raman-Tangella, Chief Medical Officer at Teladoc Health. “Access to mental health services will positively contribute to the lives of student-athletes and without a doubt, contribute to their overall success.”

This offering is a significant step towards prioritizing the mental health of student-athletes and addressing the growing need for crisis management services in the sports industry. This collaboration will not only benefit athletes but also promote a culture of mental health awareness and support in their high school and university communities.
