Market Dynamics:

Rising disability rates in the region coupled with the aging population are driving the demand for electric wheelchairs in the United Kingdom. According to the National Health Service (NHS) Digital report published in 2021, the proportion of the UK population with a disability has increased over the past few decades. In 2021, around 11.9 million people in the UK reported having a disability. Additionally, improvements in technology are spurring innovations in electric wheelchairs. Manufacturers are focusing on developing lightweight and easy to transport electric wheelchairs. Furthermore, innovations in battery technology and power efficiency are expanding the driving range of electric wheelchairs.

Increased government funding for healthcare and improving accessibility -

The UK government has been increasingly focusing on improving healthcare services and accessibility for elderly and disabled people. Substantial funding has been allocated towards improving homecare services and community support. This includes funding schemes that provide grants for equipment like electric wheelchairs for those who need them. The government recognizes the importance of independent living and aims to support it through such programs. Additional funding in the coming years is expected to further drive the demand for electric wheelchairs.

Rising prevalence of mobility issues and age-related disabilities -

As the average age of the population increases, so do age-related health conditions that impact mobility. Diseases like arthritis and conditions that require amputations are becoming more common. This translating to a growing population of people who can benefit from electric wheelchairs. Industry reports estimate that over 5 million people in the UK suffer from a disability that impacts mobility. This prevalence is projected to increase significantly in the next two decades due to demographic shifts. This growing customer base will sustain demand.
