Mark Heisey of the US Review of Books gave his commendation, acknowledging that “The author offers a fast-paced, pandemic-related, post-apocalyptic novel. The writing is simple but the speed at which the novel moves will help maintain interest for those often bored with books that develop more slowly. The plot continues to throw new circumstances at the protagonist and the reader with almost every chapter. Although AB is not a very likable character at the beginning of the narrative, he becomes more human as the story builds. Those who want a high-speed read and are looking for a post-apocalyptic book with a unique plot twist or two will be rewarded with a quick-hitting and action-filled afternoon of entertainment.”

Thomas W. Starbuck was interviewed by Benji Cole from CBS Radio on the People of Distinction network. The said network is one of the most extensive and wide-ranging radio shows in the United States. #### About the Author:

Inspired by real-world threats like Bird Flu and SARS in Southeast Asia, Thomas W. Starbuck set out on a visionary voyage in 2006 with his book, "Deadly Ground."

The main character in this riveting narrative is AB, a chimeric individual embodying a fusion of virology and genetics expertise. Readers are drawn into an intense story of survival and rebirth through AB's point of view as the protagonist searches for other survivors and creates a plan to repopulate Earth.

In addition to its descriptive narrative and striking pictures that perfectly capture the atmosphere of this apocalyptic universe, Starbuck's collaboration with artist Judy Belshe-Thorblom brought "Deadly Ground" to life. Their combined efforts go beyond typical storytelling techniques, letting readers go deeper into topics of existential vulnerability and the human spirit's unwavering resilience.
