

Schneider Williamson Reaches Excess Settlement in Atlanta Car Crash For Brain Injury Victim Originally Offered $100K

Leading Atlanta personal injury firm alters the scope of the litigation so a settlement well in excess of the insurance company policy limit can be achieved.

Williamson, a leading personal injury litigation firm based in Atlanta, Georgia, announced a settlement in an auto accident case against an insurance company that totaled nearly one million ($1,000,000) dollars, a significant increase from the insurance company's initial offer of the one hundred thousand ($100,000) dollar policy limit for injuries their client sustained as the result of the crash.

The insurer had insisted that the $100,000 policy limit was all that was available but we applied pressure and secured a settlement that was well in excess of that."

"The client was referred to us by a longstanding partner," said Jason Schneider, founding partner of Schneider Williamson. "The man had been involved in a car accident that was not his fault, and the accident caused a traumatic brain injury that impacted his job and day-to-day life. He had tried for three years to receive compensation for his injuries, but the insurance company pushed back against his claims and downplayed the seriousness of the injury."

A collision occurred between a tractor-trailer and a passenger vehicle, which caused the vehicle to swerve across the road and hit the victim's car. The victim's car rolled over multiple times, leaving him with brain injuries.

Law enforcement initially determined that the tractor-trailer was at fault for the accident, thereby absolving the other vehicle — and its driver's insurance company — from liability. "We acquired dashcam footage and consulted accident reconstruction experts to demonstrate that the passenger vehicle was at fault for the crash," said Campbell Williamson, founding partner of Schneider Williamson. "The driver's insurance company only had a policy up to $100,000, and that's all they were willing to offer our client."

Campbell describes the victim as a kind person and an active member of his community. The victim owned a local record store and was the president of an association for African-American record store owners.

The victim's brain injury significantly impacted his work. He would frequently give speeches and presentations to record store executives, but following the brain injury, he found himself "locking up" and not being able to speak clearly during these presentations. He also dealt with short-term memory challenges.

"We often say that brain injuries are invisible injuries," said Schneider. "The symptoms are subtle or not always noticeable, and for that reason, brain injury victims have difficulty making their case to the insurance company."

The Schneider Williamson client had received multiple offers from the insurance company to settle his claim for the $100,000, the maximum policy amount. However, through the litigation process, Schneider Williamson's attorneys were able to secure a much higher settlement.

"The insurer had insisted that the $100,000 policy limit was all that was available, but we applied pressure and secured a settlement that was well in excess of that," said Campbell. "Now our client can pay for ongoing medical treatment. He's in a better position to recover and get his life back on track."

Schneider Williamson advocates on behalf of personal injury victims in Georgia who were not at fault for their injuries. The firm handles cases involving car accidents, negligent security, slip and fall accidents, wrongful death lawsuits, and more.
