mainstream category. In the past, Korean cosmetic companies primarily focused on expansion in China. Today, they have adapted their packaging and marketing efforts for a global market and are also actively seeking collaborations with Western influencers. "The K-beauty skincare market is projected to grow from $1.8 billion in annual sales to over $4 billion by 2032. This growth trajectory underscores the high potential for K-Beauty worldwide," says Le Linh, Business Development Manager at B Futurist.

That said, the company also emphasises challenges related to the fast-paced nature of the industry. Brands tend to rise and fall rapidly, noting that their success is heavily influenced by social media and pop culture. "Korean cosmetics are highly trend-driven. Their popularity often hinges on the parent company's marketing efforts, including collaborations with K-pop idols or actors," Linh explained.

Capitalising on Trends

As B Futurist's strategy focuses on capitalising on the fast-paced nature of Korean cosmetics, Linh says: "Timing is critical. Western brands grow steadily over a long period of time, but Korean brands don't behave like that at all. At B Futurist, we continuously monitor the industry for emerging brands and individual products that are on the verge of going viral, helping our clients position themselves for extra growth. Hence, it's essential for our clients to keep their catalog updated, sometimes even on a monthly basis. With so many brands and new products entering the market, it's challenging our clients to evaluate them all. That's where the value of B Futurists comes in," says says Linh.

By taking advantage of its network of brand companies and suppliers, B Futurist curates beauty products from the top 20 major Korean cosmetics brands as well as promising new brands, making it a one-stop shop for all things K-beauty.
