Definition

The Structural Health Monitoring (SHM) Market refers to the integration of sensors, data acquisition systems, and diagnostic technologies for the real-time assessment of structural integrity. SHM systems are used in various sectors, including civil engineering, aerospace, oil and gas, and energy, to monitor the health and performance of critical structures such as bridges, buildings, dams, and pipelines. The goal of SHM is to detect damage, wear, or stress in real-time, which can reduce maintenance costs and prevent catastrophic failures. The market is growing due to advancements in sensor technology, increasing infrastructure development, and government regulations for public safety.
