Dolly's arrival is an accelerator of solutions to customer needs and concurrent with the rollout the anticipated Ory Enterprise License (OEL) that is intended to meet the support and production demands of enterprises that run compliance-oriented and mission-critical products and services. A recent Ory study conducted within its OSS community showed that 66 percent of those surveyed want help with best practices, architecture and implementation while 50 percent desire a support relationship as well. The OEL is designed for customers that want to self-host Ory and

"The IAM industry is at a critical turning point where homegrown solutions and legacy providers are being replaced by more innovative solutions that prioritize modern architecture and the flexibility to adapt to ever-evolving customer requirements," said Dolly. "I've admired how trusted Ory is within the developer community through its open-source roots and amazed by the sheer scale of the projects and identities managed using Ory. I'm excited to join the Ory open-source community."
