Emory Cooper, a leadership expert with over 20 years of experience, has guided various individuals and helped them achieve their potential by consulting activities, seminars, and workshops. His approach is based on explaining theoretical methods and implementing them. Emory has recently penned down his exceptional leadership skills in his book, "Less Traveled Leadership: Essential leadership skills for today's workplace."

Cooper's book Less Traveled Leadership: Essential Leadership Skills for Today's Workplace is a complete guide on how a leader can bring their skills to life and help other leaders, too. The book is divided into three parts: personal, interpersonal, and organizational skills, which help build communication skills among other leaders and strategic thinking to create an effective leadership environment. It explains how leadership can set an example for others to follow where they learn how to lead and reflect on their inner selves.

When asked about how he feels about having a phenomenal experience in leadership where he helps other leaders grow, Cooper stated, "I am privileged and lucky to have 20 years of knowledge and experience in leadership. I have always wanted to help others in this regard because many people think leadership is all about having authority, but it is also about managing your employees effectively, having effective communication, and knowing how to regulate strategies. I don't only focus on personal skills that help a business grow, but I also try to make an individual's interpersonal leadership skills better because, as a leader, you need to have qualities like active listening, transparency, empathy, and clarity."

Indeed, Cooper's career shows his professionalism and experience. His emphasis on personal and interpersonal skills shows how one can deal effectively with organizations and employees.
