About the Author

Susan M. Borris attended twelve grades of public school, graduating in 1973. Her higher education began with two years at Community College in Elgin, Illinois, followed by a year studying English at the University of Wisconsin, Whitewater, cut short by a friend's illness. Writing became her passion in middle school, initially kindled by journalistic work for the school newspaper, though she found her true joy in creative writing with aspirations of becoming a novelist. Despite a delay in publishing, her debut, Lost Identity, was a meaningful, albeit editorially flawed, venture into novel writing.

Borris's childhood played a crucial role in her development as a writer, offering an escape and a medium to create enriching worlds and characters. Influenced by many writers, her process is unique; she writes amid the background noise of television, deeply immersing herself in her characters and their worlds, creating narratives centered around them. Describing her style as emotional, real, and sometimes intense, Borris faces challenges in overthinking and ensuring clarity for her readers.

Her commitment to her style was fortified by encouragement from her high school English teacher, underscoring her unique voice. Writing remains her sanctuary during tough times, a passion that sustains her. Her bucket list includes transforming her story starts into published books or leaving them as a legacy for her family. Borris has experienced significant life moments, such as marrying her best friend when he was diagnosed with terminal cancer—a relationship that was miraculously extended beyond his prognosis.

Today, Borris continues to write, finding peace in her craft and the simplicity of life with her family and her golden retriever, Murphy, in Oregon. Her writing retreats are a testament to her dedication, often spent in productive solitude interspersed with family time. Even through periods of loss that stalled her creativity, the importance of leaving a legacy through her writing has remained a steadfast goal.
