About the Author

Susan M. Borris was turned on to writing in middle school and has pursued it ever since, primarily in the form of creative writing with the goal of becoming a novelist. Her journey through education included two years at Community College in Elgin, Illinois, and a year at the University of Wisconsin, Whitewater, studying English. Her passion for writing helped her navigate the complexities of life, providing an escape through the creation of worlds and characters that resonated with her. Although she briefly ventured into journalism, it was not her joy; her true love lay in novel writing.

Her first published work, Lost Identity, although well-received for its story, taught her the importance of professional editing. Borris's writing style, described as emotional, real, and sometimes intense, reflects her deep connection with her characters, who often originate the stories themselves. She writes with the television as background noise, requiring it to focus, yet remains deeply invested in the fictional lives she crafts, viewing them as nearly real during the writing process.

Despite challenges of overthinking and the struggle to convey her vivid imagination to readers clearly, Borris perseveres, inspired by an English teacher's advice to never alter her distinct writing style. Her personal life has been marked by significant events, such as marrying her best friend after a terminal cancer diagnosis, which unexpectedly led to his recovery, shaping their view of life as a precious gift. This profound experience emphasized the importance of cherishing the mundane over the monumental.

Borris continues to write, driven by a desire to leave a legacy for her family, including several unfinished story starts that she hopes to transform into novels. She lives a simple, uncomplicated life near the Pacific Ocean in Oregon, cherishing time with her family and her golden retriever, Murphy, while finding joy and solace in writing and gardening.
