

John J. Malm & Associates Releases Guide Exploring What the TV Show ‘Suits’ Teaches About Personal Injury Litigation and What’s Pure Fiction

Naperville, Illinois – The TV show Suits captivated millions with its high-stakes legal battles and quick-witted lawyers, but how much of the drama accurately reflects real-life litigation? A new blog from John J. Malm & Associates, titled “What the TV Show Suits Can Teach About Personal Injury Litigation (And What’s Just Too Sensational to Happen in Real Life),” offers an insightful look at what Suits gets right about personal injury law—and where Hollywood takes it over the top.

The blog delves into key themes from Suits, comparing the show’s portrayal of legal strategies, negotiation techniques, and courtroom dynamics with the actual practices of personal injury law. While Suits does showcase elements of real-world litigation, such as the importance of settlement negotiations and case strategy, it often amplifies situations for drama, depicting confrontational exchanges and surprise courtroom moments rarely seen in real personal injury cases.

Key Takeaways from the Blog:

Realistic Negotiation Tactics – The show accurately emphasizes that many cases are resolved through negotiation rather than going to trial. However, the rapid-fire exchanges in Suits are dramatized; in real life, negotiations are far more methodical and measured.

The Role of Strategy – Suits demonstrates the need for solid preparation and strategic foresight. Real personal injury attorneys work meticulously to build strong cases, though they rarely find dramatic “smoking gun” evidence that shifts a case in a single stroke.

Deposition and Cross-Examination – While the intense questioning in Suits makes for great television, actual depositions and cross-examinations are formal and conducted under strict guidelines. Attorneys maintain professionalism and rely on well-structured questions, rather than sensational confrontations.

Expert Witnesses – Suits occasionally highlights the value of expert witnesses, a true component of personal injury law, where specialized testimony can clarify complex issues. However, experts in real cases provide factual, objective insights, not the dramatic revelations often portrayed on-screen.

Ethical Boundaries – The show’s storylines, including ethically dubious tactics, are far from reality. Personal injury attorneys adhere to strict ethical standards to represent clients honestly and legally, without bending the rules.

Courtroom Reality vs. Drama – In real life, personal injury trials are highly procedural, and there’s rarely any last-minute surprise evidence. Both parties are typically aware of the facts well in advance, and cases often settle before reaching court.

Trial lawyer John Malm notes, "While Suits is very entertaining, it doesn't quite capture the full reality of personal injury law. Working on behalf of real clients, our team keeps our focus on thorough preparation and ethical, compassionate representation. Our goal is to help our clients and their families seek justice by securing fair compensation, but without some of the drama portrayed on TV.
