Cost-effective devices are used to measure pressure on stents and balloons during various surgical procedures. These devices are of two types, which include analog transmitters and digital transmitters. These manufacturers differ from each other based on the display, which is built into the tool. For example, analog manufacturers have a scale and a needle, which shows the reading of applied pressure. This reading will be read manually by a trained professional. However, digital analog devices have automatic systems, which are connected with software.
