The Veterinary Emergency & Critical Care Society (VECCS) is a global professional organization made up of veterinarians, veterinary technicians, and practice managers dedicated to advancing knowledge and upholding superior standards in veterinary emergency and critical care. The certification program encourages facilities to provide exceptional care, aiming to elevate the standard of veterinary medicine while increasing public and professional awareness of emergency and critical care services.

Krista McDermott (CVT, CVPM), Practice Manager at Mount Laurel Animal Hospital, expressed her pride in this achievement, stating, "Achieving VECCS Facility Certification is a testament to the hard work and dedication of our entire team. We strive every day to be cutting-edge in our approach to veterinary care, ensuring that we provide the best possible services to our patients and their families. This certification not only recognizes our commitment to excellence but also enhances our capability to serve our community better."

Mount Laurel Animal Hospital is not just a facility; it is a vital resource for the community. It provides an extensive range of services, including advanced diagnostics, surgical procedures, emergency care, and specialized treatments. The hospital's commitment to education extends beyond its staff, as it actively engages with pet owners to foster understanding and responsible pet ownership. Its team of experienced veterinarians, specialists and dedicated support staff work collaboratively to create personalized care plans that cater to the unique needs of each patient.

The VECCS certification brings numerous benefits to Mount Laurel Animal Hospital, including recognition in the Journal of Veterinary Emergency and Critical Care. Additionally, the hospital will enjoy access to valuable resources such as counseling sessions for full-time staff members and subscriptions to clinical sites, enhancing the overall capabilities of the team.
