

Help Is Here: SCCC Offers Mental Health Support for Fire Impacted Angelenos

SCCC is now accepting new clients, offering low-cost, trauma-informed mental health care via sliding-scale fees, virtual, and in-person sessions.

LOS ANGELES, CA, UNITED STATES, January 29, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ --

The devastating wildfires across California have left countless individuals grappling with profound loss, trauma, and uncertainty. Experts warn that the psychological impacts of these disasters can be long-lasting, putting many at risk for ongoing mental health challenges. In response, the Southern California Counseling Center \(SCCC\), a trusted non-profit organization with nearly 60 years of service, announces it is now accepting new clients to address the rising demand for mental health support.

At SCCC, we believe mental health care is a right, not a privilege.”

Michael Koch

“SCCC remains steadfast in our commitment to supporting those affected by the fires, as well as others seeking mental health care during these difficult times,” said Michael Koch, Executive Director of SCCC. “We believe mental health care is a right, not a privilege. We offer low-cost services on a sliding-scale fee basis, and both in-person and virtual sessions, ensuring that anyone in need can access our services without barriers.”

SCCC’s team of pre-licensed therapists and paraprofessionals provide trauma-informed, culturally competent care to individuals, couples, families, and youth. Each year, the center serves over 3,000 clients, bridging the gap between mental health needs and resources to help build stronger, more resilient communities.

How to Get Started:

If you or someone you know has been impacted by the wildfires or is seeking mental health support, SCCC is here to help.
