"Sorry, Baby" is a raw and unflinching portrayal of the psychological impact of sexual trauma. The film delves into its protagonist's silent struggles, resilience, and recovery, offering a voice to those who have endured similar experiences. With its authentic and contemporary storytelling, "Sorry, Baby" is poised to strike a chord with Gen Z audiences.

"It is a film that is the rhythm, essence, and tone of younger people. It has the voice of Gen Z and will resonate with them well," says Bishop, reflecting on the film's relevance and emotional depth.

Bishop, who describes herself as being in the "third act" of her life, brings a wealth of experience to her role. Having started her journey as a teacher before transitioning into life as a wife, mother, and community member, she credits her deep understanding of the human condition as the key to preparing for this role.

"In my life, I appreciate the shift in perspective. We walk around in silent pain we all carry from time to time," Bishop explains, highlighting the film's universal themes of healing and emotional endurance.

With its gripping narrative, compelling performances, and evocative direction, "Sorry, Baby" is a must-watch film that sheds light on the realities of survival, trauma, and hope. Audiences can tune in on January 30, 2025, to experience this groundbreaking story.

About Liz Bishop

Liz Bishop is an actress whose journey into the entertainment industry is a testament to reinvention and perseverance. Embracing the "third act" of her life, she pursued her lifelong dream of acting after decades dedicated to raising children, volunteering, and working.

Raised in Cincinnati with no industry connections, Bishop found her entry into film through background work in Greta Gerwig's "Little Women." During her second background role, she recognized the power of networking and the possibility of building a career in acting.

She has secured co-star roles in the critically acclaimed "Kevin Can Fck Himself" (starring Annie Murphy). Her breakthrough came when director Alexander Payne cast her in a supporting role in the Academy Award Best Picture-nominated "The Holdovers." She was also cast in "The Walking Dead: Dead City."
