Knee replacement surgery, also known as knee arthroplasty, is a common procedure designed to relieve pain and improve function for individuals with knee joint damage, often due to osteoarthritis, rheumatoid arthritis, or injury. During the surgery, the damaged parts of the knee joint are removed and replaced with prosthetic components made of metal, plastic, and sometimes ceramic. This procedure is typically recommended when conservative treatments, such as medication, physical therapy, or injections, no longer provide relief from pain or improve mobility.

Knee replacement surgery has seen significant advancements in recent years, including minimally invasive techniques, robotic-assisted surgery, and personalized implants tailored to individual anatomy. These innovations help reduce recovery times, minimize complications, and improve the overall success rate of the procedure. As the global population ages and more people seek effective solutions for knee joint problems, the demand for knee replacement
