Recent Sales Highlights:

- "Tangled in Desire" sold for $185,000, marking a substantial appreciation from its initial listing price.
- A large-scale triptych commissioned for a corporate client was finalized at $685,000, highlighting the growing interest from luxury office spaces and real estate developers.
- Three metallic paintings by New York City contemporary artist Marko Stout have been resold to an unnamed collector from Russia for $1.3 million. The transaction reflects a notable increase in the value of Stout's works, which were originally purchased by New York art dealer

Ronald Cohen for $205,000 at the artist's Spring 2024 exhibition, "Glitz & Glamour," held at the Anita Rodgers Gallery in Manhattan.

“The increasing demand for Marko Stout’s work reflects both the unique appeal of his artistic style and the broader trend of contemporary art being viewed as a viable investment asset,” said [Insert Name], an art market analyst based in New York.

Stout’s art has been featured in exhibitions across New York, Los Angeles, and international galleries, with notable collectors from the entertainment industry and corporate sectors. His works have also been showcased in luxury hotels, executive offices, and high-end private residences, solidifying his reputation as an artist whose work transcends traditional gallery spaces.

In addition to private sales, Stout has received commissions from corporate clients seeking bespoke installations tailored to their brand identity and architectural spaces. His ability to create custom, large-scale artworks has made him a preferred choice for businesses looking to integrate contemporary art into their environments.
