How Is The Prevalence Of Hereditary Angioedema HAE Driving The Market?

Driving the impressive growth of the Takhzyro market forward is the increasing prevalence of hereditary angioedema HAE. This severe condition is a rare genetic disorder defined by recurrent swelling in various body areas, often impacting the airway and potentially life-threatening. The mounting number of HAE cases supported by increased awareness, superior genetic testing, and the discovery of spontaneous mutations in the C1 inhibitor gene, all exacerbated by environmental triggers. Using Takhzyro lanadelumab helps patients prevent HAE attacks by inhibiting kallikrein, effectively lowering bradykinin levels and decreasing the frequency and severity of swelling episodes. The Rare Disease Advisor, a reputable US-based nonprofit organization, in June 2022, shed light on HAE affecting roughly 1 in 50,000 individuals globally. With prevalence estimates typically ranging from 1:10,000 to 1:150,000, HAE accounts for about 2% of all clinical angioedema cases. Thus, the growing prevalence of HAE is significantly driving the growth of the Takhzyro market.
