

National Home School Association Announces Plan to Develop Self-Directed Learning Centers Nationwide

PARKER, CO, UNITED STATES, February 13, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ -- The National Home School Association (NHTA) is launching an initiative to develop a nationwide network of Self-Directed Learning Centers (SDLCs), offering families an alternative education model that emphasizes student-driven learning, flexibility, and innovation. The NHTA is working toward establishing 10,000 SDLCs across the country, starting with the development of its flagship location.

With growing interest in alternative education models, the NHTA aims to provide a structured yet flexible learning environment that allows students to explore their interests, develop critical thinking skills, and gain real-world experience through mentorship from educators and professionals. The SDLC model is designed to offer a personalized approach to education, allowing students to progress at their own pace, and learn in their own way while focusing on subjects and skills relevant to their individual goals.

To support this initiative, the NHTA is collaborating with the International Self-Directed Learning Foundation (ISDLF), which is in the process of establishing itself as a 501(c)(3) nonprofit organization. This partnership will enable the NHTA to seek grants, donations, and philanthropic support to fund the expansion of SDLCs and provide resources for families exploring alternative education options.

A Vision for the Future of Education

The NHTA's Self-Directed Learning Centers will offer students a structured yet flexible alternative to traditional schooling by:

- Providing families with total control over their children’s education.
- Offering a cost-effective model designed to optimize educational resources.
- Encouraging independent learning, innovation, and entrepreneurship.

J. Allen Weston, Executive Director of the NHSA, emphasized the significance of this initiative, stating:

“We believe in creating a new education system that nurtures a lifelong love of learning while equipping students with the skills they need to succeed in the modern world. Our goal is to empower families with the ability to choose how their children learn.”

Join the Movement

The NHSA and ISDLF invite educators, investors, and families to be part of this initiative and support the development of SDLCs across the country to assist in the eventual phase-out of the current public education system.
