

Magnolia Texas Real Estate Agents share Insights on creating a Functional Office Space in a New Home

Real Estate in Magnolia, TX and Tomball, TX - tips on setting up a home office and how to assess a potential home's suitability

MAGNOLIA, TX, UNITED STATES, February 13, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Carswell Real Estate has insights on buying a suitable home when one of the priorities will be setting up a home office. While many properties have rooms that can be easily adapted to become a home office, it can be seen as a positive factor when looking at potential homes if a home office is already furnished and functional. Taking the guesswork out of how a space might operate is one bonus, and it is likely that necessary pre-wiring and connectivity are already set up. When discussing a home office in this blog, the insights apply equally well to a dedicated space for homework or studying.

There are several advantages to having a natural light source, and desk placement will largely be guided by this one factor. Having a view outside to a garden, or over a golf course, or even just into the neighborhood, can provide a distraction, relaxation, and give an easy way to stop staring at the computer screen every few minutes to focus on something further away - a common recommendation to gives your eyes a rest throughout the day.

Where bright light can add glare to the screen, shading the light source with curtains, or more commonly blinds, will add the extra control needed to make the most of the light when it helps. This could mean that the blinds are generally open, but closed occasionally. This may also help when meetings are being done overnight or when the intention is to block light from the office from spilling onto the garden or the rest of the house. For the hot Texas summers, an awning outside the window or a covered patio may also provide the necessary shade to facilitate working from home.

Another advantage of being near a window when working is the ability to open it, let in some fresh air, listen to a water feature in the garden, or watch over children playing in the back yard. Light sources need not only be from a window to the exterior of the home, it's also common to have French doors with multiple window panes as the doors into the office - natural light from the foyer or hallway may also contribute to the brightness.

Generally, working from home is considered more relaxing when there is natural light than when there is only an artificial light source, although this may be the only option if the only suitable office space is downstairs in the basement for instance.

Home office planning usually involves thinking ahead to storage solutions and easy access to any number of tools or reference materials that might be needed during the day. Bookshelves are a popular choice, and a desk with drawers and file storage is functional as well as a way to experiment with interior design to personalize the space. Having a clock on the wall (or several clocks in different time zones if it is helpful) can be a reminder and is another opportunity to add decor that is both useful and stylish. Where more than one person could want to use the home office space, setting up desks or workstations near to each other can be done so the room looks aesthetically appealing as a whole, with each space customized and personalized enough to make it fit for purpose and welcoming. Wires can be trip hazards, so bundling cables and wiring efficiently and safely should be a priority.

First impressions count, so for homebuyers who understand they will need their home office to present a professional image to clients and colleagues, it is important to think about the backdrop behind the desk, the view that meeting attendees at a video conference will see. Although it is usually possible to blur the background on a video call or to use the software to choose a predefined, standard background, it is also less to worry about if the background is suitable, projecting the right image.
