The private nursing services market boosting from $550.23 billion in 2024 to an outstanding $595.28 billion in 2025, market watchers can't help but take notice. This monumental increase, at a compound annual growth rate CAGR of 8.2%, is largely driven by a spiked prevalence of chronic diseases, an amplified population of working adults, an increased post-surgical care necessity, rising counts of chronic care facilities, and surging obesity rates.

Are you curious about the future of the private nursing services market?

Brace for even more growth in the forthcoming years. Expected to surge to a staggering $807.07 billion in 2029 at a compound annual growth rate CAGR of 7.9%, the wind of growth continues to billow the private nursing services market sails. Factors lubricating this robust forecasted growth include a multiplying global count of surgeries, a burgeoning aged populace, elevating healthcare costs, growing awareness about private nursing services, and a swelling demand for personalized care.

Why is the private nursing services' market skyrocketing?

A leading fuel is the inflating prevalence of chronic diseases. Chronic diseases have blistered worldwide due to factors like an aging population, lifestyle adaptations, and environmental influences. Private nursing services have emerged as reliable front-runners in offering consistent care, fostering a strong patient-nurse relationship that underpins effective chronic condition management and enhances overall health outcomes.

In August 2022, the American College of Cardiology, a US-based non-profit medical association, released a report, projecting a notable increase in the four major cardiovascular risk factors from 2025 to 2060 in the United States. Picking up the pace, diabetes is slated to witness the most significant leap with a 39.3% surge to 55 million individuals, followed by dyslipidemia 27.6% to 126 million, hypertension 25.1% to 162 million, and obesity 18.3% to 126 million. Such chronic disease proliferation is a major driving force behind the roaring private nursing services market.
