A Groundbreaking Victory of Osuji

Osuji is pleased to share with his audience a memorable case, for which he went above and beyond.

“I have to pick one out of 10,000 cases,” Osuji said laughing. The case involved a client who was wrongfully terminated after a decade of service at a company. He approached Osuji to seek compensation. However, in the days before the trial, Osuji just realized that the company had been restructured to form a new company and all the assets and belongings were transferred to it. In the middle of the trial, he had to adjourn the trial and change his strategy.

At this point, Osuji made a ground-breaking decision to add the new business and the owners to the case as accountable. And the result? Osuji triumphed in that case. He was able to help his client get the judgment against not just the company, but also against the new business and the owners/shareholders.

“That was one of the first in Alberta where a judge allowed the owners of a business to be part of the lawsuit,” he said.

This case was significant because it reinforced the idea that businesses cannot evade responsibility by simply restructuring. The court’s decision ensured true justice for Osuji’s client—which is one of those proud moments for Osuji as Alberta’s renowned Employment Lawyer.

In Alberta, Workplace harassment and wrongful termination remain pressing issues. Osuji provides valuable advice for his audience on workplace harassment.

>> Protection Against Wrongful Termination

Employees have a myriad of protections for their rights. One key protection is human rights legislation, which allows an employee to file a complaint if the termination is based on protected grounds, such as gender, sexual orientation, mental health, or family status. In addition to this, there is the Employment Standards Code which offers protections in specific situations, such as termination while on medical leave. Employees have the option to take legal action to seek remedies, including compensation, severance, and other entitlements.

>> Workplace Harassment

“Unfortunately, this is a very recurrent scenario. A majority of conversations I have with potential clients revolve around employee harassment, and workplace issues of discrimination.”

He strongly recommends filing a complaint with the employer. He also encourages the employees to report the concern internally first before trying to navigate the matter legally. It is because, sometimes the people in the upper hierarchy—the employer, supervisor, manager, and subordinate—may not be aware of the concern. It is important to get in touch with them and let them resolve the conflict/concern first.

He also addresses the psychological challenges one would undergo during such situations. His recommendation is to take a ‘stress leave’ to allow the mental uncertainties to settle down and let the management deal with the situation. If the case remains unfavorable, the employee can extend their medical leave, file a case for human rights, resign under protest, and take an action against the employer for constructive dismissal, he said. What’s more, employees also have a ‘Whistle Blower Mechanism’ to protect their rights within an organization.

>> What if the Employer is in the Scenario?

According to Osuji, employers must have updated policies to address workplace harassment and must hire an independent investigator to look at the situation objectively. Having an independent investigator is especially beneficial, in case the complaints involve upper management and it ensures that the best interests of the business are protected.

For individuals seeking justice or for employers needing assistance with proactive compliance measures, Osuji and his team offer a combination of legal expertise, compassionate representation, and innovative fee structures.
