As part of the inaugural weekend, Helping a Hero hosted a special luncheon on Saturday before the inauguration to honor these veterans. The event featured Pete Hegseth, the then nominee for Secretary of Defense, along with distinguished legislators and members of the incoming administration. The luncheon celebrated the bravery and resilience of the nation's wounded veterans and highlighted their advocacy for policies that benefit all who wear the uniform.

“We are thrilled to honor our heroes at such historic moments,” said Meredith Iler, Founder of the Helping a Hero Homes Program. “Their sacrifices for our freedom deserve recognition and action. Bringing them to Washington allows their voices to be heard as we work together to shape policies that support their long-term needs. We appreciate the generous support of Mercuria to help us make these events a reality.”

Helping a Hero's participation in these inaugural events was made possible through the sponsorship of Mercuria, which sponsored the luncheon and other activities, enabling wounded veterans to attend key inauguration events.

“Supporting veterans is a cornerstone of our community engagement,” said, Cody Moore, Head of Gas and Power Trading for Mercuria Energy America. “We are proud to partner with Helping a Hero to ensure these courageous men and women have the opportunity to witness and participate in our democratic traditions. Their service is a profound reminder of the freedoms we enjoy.”

This collaborative effort underscores Helping a Hero’s mission to provide adaptive homes and resources to wounded service members. Over the years, the organization has awarded more than 200 specially adapted homes to combat-injured veterans across 27 states. Through continued partnerships and advocacy, Helping a Hero remains committed to expanding support services, including marriage and caregiver retreats, wellness initiatives, and emergency assistance programs.

“Each of our heroes has a powerful story of perseverance and patriotism,” Iler added. “With the help of supporters like Mercuria, we are not only building homes—we are building futures.”
