The report also highlights the growing use of ceramic proppants, which are known for their high strength and conductivity, in the oil and gas industry. These proppants are increasingly being used in deep and high-pressure wells, which require stronger and more durable materials. The rise in offshore drilling activities is also expected to drive the demand for ceramic proppants in the coming years.

As the demand for energy continues to grow, the global proppants market is expected to witness steady growth in the coming years. However, concerns over the environmental impact of fracking and the availability of alternative energy sources may hinder the market growth. Nevertheless, the proppants market is poised for significant growth, providing opportunities for both established players and new entrants in the industry.
