

Dennis P. Block & Associates is Leading the Legal AI Revolution

Los Angeles, California – In the spring of 2023, Los Angeles landlord attorney Dennis Block made headlines after an opposition to a tenant eviction motion filed by his office included AI-generated case law that had not been properly verified. The judge admonished the firm, highlighting the importance of human oversight when using emerging technology in legal filings. The incident sparked widespread media attention and opened a national conversation about the role of artificial intelligence in the legal field.

But behind the headlines was a far more nuanced—and ultimately visionary—story.

Block's firm wasn't reckless so much as early. Long before most firms were even aware of generative AI's potential, Block's office was already experimenting with its use in legal workflows. Their error wasn't in exploring the technology— it was being ahead of the curve without a roadmap.

"If you look at where the profession is today versus where it was in 2023, the pace of change is astonishing," says Block. "Our case was a cautionary tale, yes—but it also revealed how unprepared the industry was for what was coming."

Indeed, less than two years later, the legal field has surged forward. Major players like LexisNexis and Westlaw have since launched AI-enhanced research tools. Law firms are onboarding "legal innovation" officers and tech specialists. AI is now being used for everything from document review and contract analysis to brief generation. Even OpenAI's ChatGPT—the very tool Block's office first explored—has since rolled out a legal-specific version, further validating its growing role in the profession.

Block, for his part, has embraced the lessons learned and doubled down on innovation. His firm has implemented clear internal protocols requiring attorney review of all AI-generated materials, while also working with legal tech consultants to build smart, compliant workflows.

But Block's tech-forward approach goes far beyond just generative AI.

For example, his firm uses RFID chips embedded in physical case files, making it possible to track and locate important documents instantly—a move more common in Fortune 500 logistics than small law offices. He's also incorporated AI directly into the firm's public-facing tools: the firm's website, www.evict123.com, now features an interactive AI-powered chat assistant that provides users with real-time guidance. The chat encourages users to describe their property type and rent control status, offering tailored responses and the option for follow-up via email—all without storing personal data.

Block's media footprint is just as innovative as his legal practice. Every week, Block hosts a talk radio-style show on his YouTube channel @evict123, where he presents timely topics on landlord-tenant law and takes live calls from listeners. It's part education, part outreach, and all part of his broader vision: using technology to make legal services more accessible, transparent, and responsive.

"The future came fast," Block reflects. "We were the first ones on the rollercoaster. It got bumpy—but now everyone else is getting on board."

As the legal industry continues to evolve, Block remains at the forefront—not just keeping pace, but setting it.

"Without our pioneering spirit," he says, "we wouldn't be where we are today. From AI to RFID to interactive media, we're not afraid to try what others haven't. Not for novelty's sake, but because we believe that innovation is how we best serve our clients—with speed, accuracy, and creativity."

The AI revolution in law is no longer on the horizon. It's here. And Dennis Block? He was there at the beginning.
