

Tariffs, AI, and competition with China: experts say America's opportunity to regain tech supremacy is now

A new series of reports by New Lines Institute outlines bold steps the U.S. needs to take to secure its strategic technological advantage.

WASHINGTON, DC, UNITED STATES,
April 7, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ --

New Lines Institute for Strategy and Policy released a set of policy recommendations and reports today under its new Tech Sovereignty & Security portfolio. The compendium, Future-Proofing U.S. Technology: Strategic Priorities Amid Chinese Tech Advancement, crafted by experts from industry, government, and academia, offers bold, actionable recommendations to secure the United States' technological advantage amid China's growing capabilities.

Giving insight into a diverse set of strategic technologies shaping the geopolitical landscape, the report focuses on artificial intelligence, industrial policy, cybersecurity, and critical minerals. Former U.S. Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff describes the compendium as setting "out a path forward to launch policies that take a comprehensive and strategic approach to advancing critical technologies in the West."

Lead analyst and head of the Tech Sovereignty and Security portfolio at New Lines Institute, Kelsey Quinn, said "the technological rivalry between the United States and China transcends traditional geopolitical competition. It represents a systemic challenge that cuts across economic, security, and diplomacy domains and demands a response that harnesses America's innovative capacity."

America's technological advantage, which has been a cornerstone of its economic prosperity and national security for decades, must be secured with collaborative, cross-sectoral action. This compendium's policy recommendations serve as a strategic blueprint for the U.S. to take these kinds of solutions forward.
