Personalised Learning through Adaptive Systems: A Case Study on UN SDGs, DE&I, and Work Ethics in an African Context. This empirical pre-intervention study surveyed 1,161 students and 58 faculty members to examine initial Knowledge, Attitude, and Perception (KAP) towards Adaptive Learning Systems (ALS) before final design and implementation.

The study's mission was threefold: to understand the effectiveness of AI-generated learning materials, assess the impact of ALS on learning outcomes, and explore how ALS data can empower educators to optimize learning design and delivery. The first phase of the research was presented at the 20th International CDIO Conference at ESPRIT, Tunisia, and subsequently showcased at UNESCO's Digital Learning Week in Paris, spotlighting AI's transformative role in education and digital innovation.

Innovation remains a core pillar of the network's mission to transform lives through relevant education for lifetime success. Learn more about Honoris' dual innovation approach to harnessing AI here.
