

TitleFrame Launches to Reignite Georgia's Film Industry

Atlanta-based TitleFrame aims to revive Georgia's film industry through community, collaboration, and creativity.

ATLANTA, GA, UNITED STATES, May 12, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ -- In a time when the film industry is facing widespread uncertainty and production slowdowns, especially in Georgia, a new Atlanta-based production company is stepping up to spark renewed momentum through community, collaboration, and creativity. TitleFrame officially launched earlier this year as a full-service film production company and creative hub, committed to rebuilding and sustaining the local industry through powerful storytelling, strategic partnerships, and a strong community of creators.

Housed inside Vision Studios in Chamblee, TitleFrame offers a comprehensive suite of services including film and video production, equipment rentals, crew staffing, and studio space. But what truly sets TitleFrame apart is its mission: to unite and empower the Georgia film community during a critical moment of transition. With more and more productions moving overseas, and a potential 100% tariff on foreign-made films, the industry has its eyes on the independent film market. TitleFrame is preparing for the "indie boom" or "independent renaissance" with its slate of upcoming projects, distribution tactics, and its Film Collective. The "TitleFrame Film Collective" aims to build a reliable centralized source for dedicated and professional local production crews and talent.

"The industry has lost some of its steam," says Film Director & Producer Andrew Burn, co-founder of TitleFrame. "But Georgia's creative potential hasn't gone anywhere. TitleFrame is committed to supporting the Georgia film industry by empowering and sustaining Y'alllywood with homegrown projects written, produced, and finished here in Georgia. We are partnering with other major players within the local industry to help make this a reality."

Founded by four local filmmakers—Andrew Burn, Matthew Bryant, W.L. Walker, and Doug Williams—TitleFrame is more than a production company; it's a movement. By building a resilient network of filmmakers, producers, and crew members, TitleFrame aims to counteract industry stagnation with collaboration, opportunity, and momentum.

Co-founder Matthew Bryant adds, “ultimately, TitleFrame’s outreach and community building is what allows us to punch way above our weight class—we’re able to service any production of any size.”

The company hosts regular networking mixers, workshops, and panel discussions featuring both emerging and established talent. These events serve not only as educational opportunities but also as platforms to foster meaningful professional connections within Georgia’s film ecosystem.

TitleFrame currently has a slate of feature films and short films in development, all anchored in the belief that local productions can fuel a national revival in independent film.

The next in-person event—a filmmaker education and networking mixer—will be held on Saturday, June 28, at the TitleFrame headquarters inside the Vision Studios event hall in Chamblee, Georgia. Creatives of all levels are encouraged to attend, connect, and join the movement. Tickets are available on Eventbrite.
