Hidden Roadblocks Making Australian Migration Tougher in 2025

Nishant started with the roadblocks and current trends in Australian migration law. As per his insights, the migration law is in a state of constant flux, with frequent updates and policy changes. This ever-evolving nature demands that both prospective migrants and professionals remain more vigilant about the updates, adapt to new strategies, and approach the law with more innovation & creativity.

Currently, the migration law in Australia has become increasingly turbulent. While there are a lot of reasons behind this, Nishant points out three prominent driving factors.

- >> Increasing housing problems
- >> Persistent job shortages
- >> Ongoing pressures of inflation

These things tie the nation's migration system in knots and make the process even more layered and difficult to navigate, especially for international students who are looking for permanent or work visas.

The team at Professional Visa and Education Services

"We have seen some significant changes from when we started ten years ago versus now. Things have always been tougher and stricter around the migration policies," Nishant said. Individuals who consider moving to Australia must prepare in advance to achieve the desirable outcomes. Being informed, realistic and proactive is also critical.

Professional Visa: Navigating Complexity with Confidence

Nishant Sharma's skilled team at Professional Visa and Education Services makes it easier for their clients to navigate the complex Australian migration system. They never allow these policy revisions and shifting trends to affect their strategies. Rather, they respond to them with more diligence and keep an eye on these updates regularly to adopt new, results-driven strategies.

Professional Visa tries to stay relevant and to be at the edge of the competition. Unlike other professionals who rely on the media outlets for new updates, this team closely follows the announcements directly from the Department of Home Affairs ministers, including Southern Ministers, Assistant Ministers and other state and regional officials.

They follow not only the newly emerging trends, but also the scope on the edge, works in progress, and files that these departments have been working on. This way, they predict the advancements earlier, adapt to the changes and help their clients make more informed, relevant decisions.

One Golden Piece of Advice for Tomorrow's Migrants

One piece of advice that Nishant provides for the prospective migrants who are looking to obtain permanent and work visas is: "swim with the flow, not against the current."

"Always try to find out what the real need is for Australia and be relevant with the laws and policies," he said. Considering the labor and skills shortages, there is an enormous scope for international students. However, it is crucial to invest the time and effort in the skills in-demand to heighten the chance of approval from the Australian Government.

"There's one other piece of advice that I would like to provide is instead of chasing permanent residency, you should really look into studying the course that is more relevant and that really entices you and your future career aspirations. The permanent residency will just start chasing you as opposed to you chasing permanent residency because then you will be more relevant to the Australian market and have a stronger skill set to demonstrate to the government that you're relevant to Australian jobs and the skill market."

What is on the Horizon?

As Nishant anticipates, the upcoming election in Australia can bring more changes to the migration system in 2025. Therefore, if the Labor government remains in power, the regulations and policies, especially in terms of employer-sponsored visas, general skilled migration, and the 485 visa, are likely to continue.

If the new government takes the office, a shift in Home Affairs can happen, leading to changes in the policies. Either way, Nishant and his team are closely monitoring developments and keeping themselves informed.
