The album is meant to feel raw and dirty, but also beautiful. I wanted it to reflect how messy and fragile our lives can be, and how even in that chaos, there's something worth holding onto.”

Band returns with Hail to the Dogs, a gripping and emotionally charged new album, released today. Diving deep into the raw undercurrents of human experience, this new record explores loneliness, longing, and the unrelenting need for authenticity in a world obsessed with validation.

Inspired by the dark totalitarian allegories of George Orwell's Animal Farm, Hail to the Dogs paints a portrait of a generation grappling with unseen powers and personal disillusionment. The album title and cover art get their inspiration from the book's concept, where no matter the species, there will always be a group looking to impose power and dominance.

Recorded across Washington D.C. and Northern Virginia with producers Ben Green (Ivokota Studios) and Nico Laget (Sweet Spot Studios), the project captures a raw and soulful sound, pulling from the spirit of 1990s alt-rock while carving something wholly its own.

The lead single, “Good Boy,” which released May 15, sets the tone with its punk-tinged high energy sound, centering on a yearning to escape materialism and rediscover purpose. Other highlights include “Is This All There Is?,” a searing portrayal of communication breakdown in a fractured relationship, and “Break,” reimagined from their earlier Spaceman EP to capture the fire of their live performances.

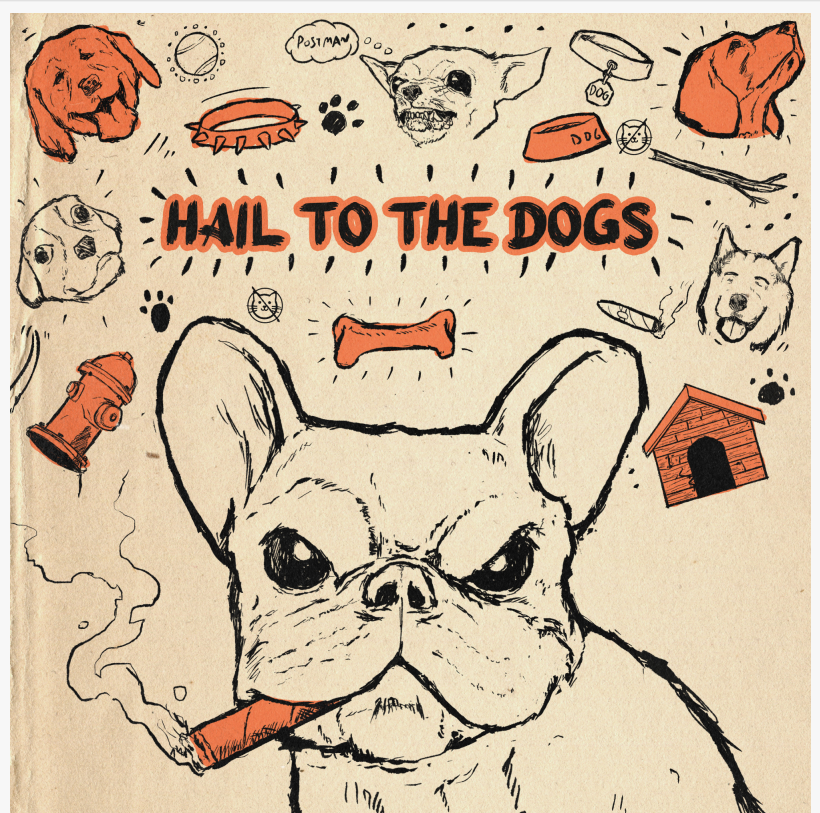

With standout tracks like the urgent, biting, “Find Me,” and the brooding anthem, “Dark Days, Long Nights,” Hail to the Dogs cements Aidan Leclaire Band's reputation for creating music that is visceral, relatable, and timeless.
