Following the critical themes introduced in “The Medical Project,” author Nicholas Licausi returns with “The U.S. Leadership Program,” a political and technological fiction that explores how government-backed innovation can drive systemic change. The novel continues the story of John and Kate Colombo—two skilled professionals whose prior success with a groundbreaking medical initiative has earned them the trust and attention of national leadership.

The U.S. Leadership Program

As inaugural members of a newly launched federal initiative, John and Kate are given broad authority to initiate and implement large-scale projects. Backed by the President and a growing network of institutional support, the pair navigate complex challenges in sectors ranging from healthcare and infrastructure to security and social services. The book balances action and strategic problem-solving with scenes of bureaucratic friction and opposition—highlighting the very real roadblocks that can stall even the most well-intentioned plans.

Although fictional, “The U.S. Leadership Program” draws on real frustrations with how technology is underutilized in solving major societal problems. Licausi’s professional background in aerospace engineering, programming, and executive leadership informs the technical components of the story, while the inspiration for the book is deeply personal. The author began writing as a response to the loss of his daughter and continued exploring themes of reform and innovation in each subsequent project.

The novel is the second installment in what may become a larger series. Licausi has previously published "The Medical Project," a healthcare-focused thriller, and "Self Help and Mental Health: Tough Path to Wellness," a nonfiction title coauthored with his son about living with schizophrenia. Together, these works reflect Licausi's interest in using storytelling to present practical ideas and long-term solutions.

Now retired, Licausi devotes his time to writing and philanthropic efforts. He supports medical advancement through the Licausi Family Fund at Nova Southeastern University's Dr. Pallavi Patel College of Health Care Sciences, and contributes to West Virginia University, his alma mater, where he earned his degree in aerospace engineering.
