

Kyle Tielens of Tielens Construction Highlights Long-Term Savings Over Upfront Costs in HelloNation

Is choosing the cheapest building materials really the best way to save money on a construction project?

LUXEMBURG, WI, UNITED STATES, July 16, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Is choosing the cheapest building materials really the best way to save money on a construction project? That question is examined in Why Cheapest Isn't Always Cheapest, a feature in HelloNation magazine where Cindy Tielens of Tielens Construction in Luxemburg, Wisconsin, shares her professional perspective on material selection and construction investment.

“

Investing in higher-quality materials upfront can lead to significant savings in the long run.”

Kyle Tielens

The article explains that while low-cost options may reduce upfront expenses, they often lead to higher maintenance costs, frequent replacements, and lower durability. Tielens encourages homeowners and builders to consider the life cycle cost of materials rather than focusing solely on the initial price. By choosing higher-quality, durable materials, property owners can reduce long-term construction expenses and improve overall performance, including better resistance to weather and improved energy efficiency.

Tielens also points out that premium materials often come with extended warranties, fewer disruptions, and increased property value. Evaluating the total cost of ownership—factoring in durability, maintenance needs, and replacement frequency—can reveal that investing in quality up front is often the most cost-effective path.

Why Cheapest Isn't Always Cheapest offers a practical look at how informed decisions about materials can result in smarter financial outcomes over the life of a construction project.
