

Laura Sawosko's Song 'The Songwriters' Scores Prestigious Placement on Famed Music Row

Singer-songwriter's love letter to the songwriter community is showcased at boutique hotel Motif on Music Row's Lyric Lane.

NASHVILLE, TN, UNITED STATES, August 5, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ -- Nashville-based artist Laura Sawosko received the honor of having the lyrics to "Songwriters," her homage to the often-underappreciated community, hung in the glamorous Music Row all-suite hotel lobby.

The gifted artist -- who released her sixth album, "Not What I Do," in April -- doesn't sugarcoat the many challenges songwriters face thanks to streaming and the infiltration of AI. Instead, she digs right into the tenacity it takes to make it as a songwriter — particularly in the saturated Nashville market — and how one must love putting pen to paper to pursue it.

"When we leave our day jobs, that's when our work begins," sings Sawosko about the incessant grind, "Writing songs that will outlive us, you'll be playing for your kids." Sawosko's personal account is on par with how outspoken the community has been of late. With top songwriters speaking out left and right about the industry power imbalance, Sawosko's song is right on point. She addresses what so many are asking for, which is to make a liveable wage.

Yet, in a city like Nashville, where an expertly crafted song is still valued, Sawosko has found her tribe. She considers it a privilege to have the honest lyrics she is known for hung in a hall beside her heroes. "To have my song lyrics hung next to people who I have seen in concert playing them in real life and besides icons like Chris Stapleton, who I so admire, makes me feel extremely humbled and grateful."

About Laura Sawosko

Laura Sawosko is a Nashville-based singer-songwriter and pianist who has released five albums, including "The Songwriters" in 2019. With influences from artists like Brandi Carlile, James Taylor, and Lori McKenna, Laura creates deeply personal songs with rich, poetic lyrics and a distinctive Americana sound. Her music has been praised for its vulnerability and raw emotional energy, drawing listeners in with its authenticity and depth.
