and long-buried love converge across centuries, MacKinnon weaves a gripping tale of healing, destiny, and the echoes of lives lived before.

In the Scottish Highlands, centuries of superstition, prejudice, and jealousy culminated in the tragic burnings of countless innocent women. The curse uttered in 1727 haunts Adam MacArthur today, manifesting as a hereditary disease that threatens to claim his life before his mid-thirties. When Adam collapses in a quiet bookshop, only the touch of a stranger with a mysterious healing power saves him.

Màiri MacLachlan, frightened by her sudden gift, unknowingly opens a bridge between their lives—and their past. Together, they uncover a strange book detailing Sine Gilchrist, the 'last witch' executed in Scotland, and the forbidden love she shared with Hugh Sutherland. As an arsonist stalks them and shadows of ancestral hatred rise once more, Adam and Màiri must race against time—and history—to break the flames of the past...before they consume them all. Now bound by fate and flickering embers, their love must either shatter a deadly legacy—or be consumed by it.
