ABOUT THE QUONSET HUT

The casual passerby may not see the Quonset Hut as they travel down the streets of Louisville, KY; one might never know the prefabricated metal building is there at all, if they are not looking for it. When visitors reach the Hut, which is perched on the edge of Phoenix Hill, they can take in a panoramic view of the city of Louisville. The street address is a stairway and, at the top, the garden setting seems like a hidden, private world.

The hillside has been a storied lookout spot since the 1870s, but the structures have changed from a simple park with a gazebo and pleasure garden to a World War II surplus building used as a storage facility. Some even remember the Hut as a summer ice cream parlor, hammock workshop, and concrete statue factory. However, after all of the transformations that the space has gone through, the Quonset Hut remains a place to gather with friends—and now, to look at art.

Since the renovation into a year-round structure, owners Leslie and James Millar have hosted numerous local and national artists. In the last few years, the Quonset Hut—with the help of Matthew Bradley—has expanded its program and presentation of contemporary art and the unexpected. In 2025, the Quonset Hut has mounted exhibits by John Begley, Sara Olshansky, Letitia Quesenberry and, in September, will open a show for Rosalie Rosenthal in conjunction with the Louisville Photo Biennial. The Quonset Hut also proudly features musical performances and hosts readings, presentations, and celebrations of all kinds.

Beyond bringing a spotlight onto artists' work, the Quonset Hut also functions as a printmaking studio equipped for lithography, intaglio, serigraphy, and relief printing, as well as paper making and book arts.
