Rohan, Based Dating Client

and Dating App Photographer Based Vincent has expanded his services to support men across the United States with professional photography and personalized coaching. His approach combines technical photography with profile strategy and communication coaching, helping clients strengthen their online presence on dating apps.

With increasing demand in cities such as New York, San Francisco, and Seattle, Vincent provides a structured program that includes wardrobe guidance, location planning, portrait sessions, and expression coaching.

Clients also receive profile prompt optimization, photo sequencing strategies, and coaching on conversations and first-date planning.

Vincent's work is rooted in personal experience. As an Asian dating coach, he has spoken openly about facing similar challenges to those of his clients. On his blog, he describes how underwhelming dating app results led him to study photography, psychology, and dating behaviors. Over time, he developed a system that improved his own outcomes and now informs his professional services.

“I realized the issue wasn't just the apps. It was how I showed up. Once I changed the visuals and messaging, everything shifted,” said Vincent.

Early demand for Vincent's work began locally, then expanded as more clients shared their experiences. Today, many of his clients are professionals in tech, finance, or startups who value his background and tailored approach. “Vincent is the real deal. He 25x'd my Hinge match rate,” said Ted, a client from Los Angeles. “Now I get more attention in a week than I did all year.”

His business has seen particular growth in New York, where shoots frequently take place in Central Park, DUMBO, and SoHo. Clients highlight his eye for lighting, composition, and subtle posing that balances approachability with confidence.

The service has drawn interest from men who previously struggled with online dating due to limited photos, underdeveloped prompts, or uncertainty about messaging. "Vincent didn't just give me photos. He gave me a pathway and mindset," said Steven, a client from Texas. "Within weeks, I went from no experience to consistent dates."

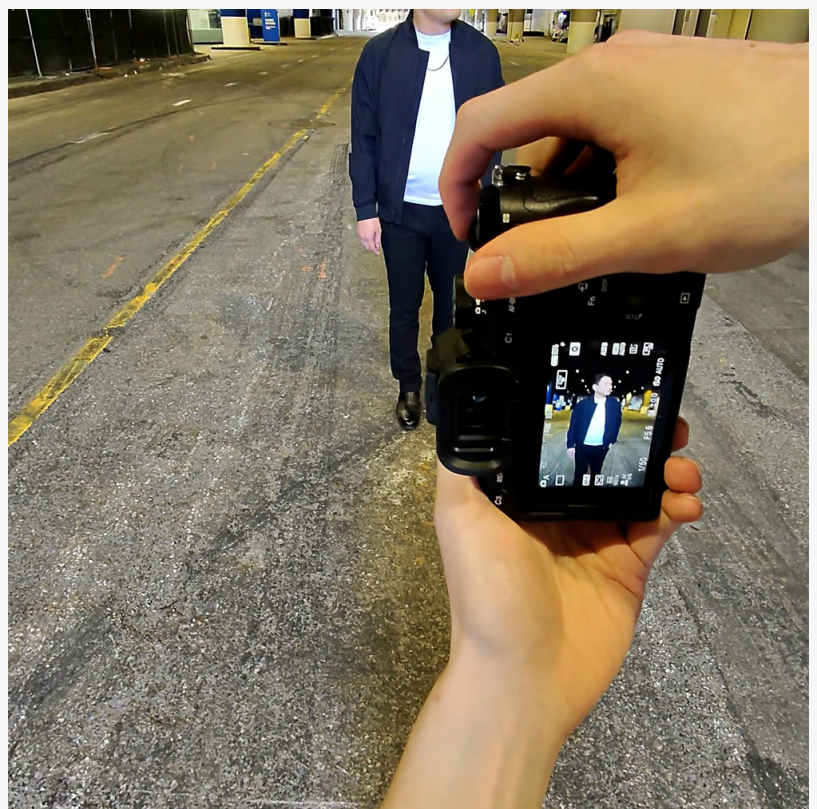

Client transformations often include upgraded wardrobe choices, improved grooming, and strategic photo

selection, combined with ongoing coaching. Another client, John, shared that he had considered leaving dating apps altogether until new photos and profile prompts helped him secure multiple dates. "I used to hate dating apps. Now I'm actually excited," he said.

While individual results vary, many clients report increases in match rates and greater engagement in conversations. One client noted reaching maximum visibility on Tinder and Bumble within weeks. These outcomes are shared through testimonials on Vincent's website and social media channels.

Beyond photography, Vincent advises on first-date planning, conversation pacing, and relationship-building strategies. He emphasizes that for many clients, this is their first opportunity to receive structured mentorship in dating.

The expansion comes at a time when online dating continues to dominate how relationships begin. According to a Pew Research Center study, nearly 3 in 10 adults in the U.S. have used a dating app, and a significant percentage of long-term relationships now originate online. Despite this, many men report feeling overlooked or discouraged by low match rates and limited engagement. Asian American men, in particular, have been shown in multiple studies to receive fewer responses compared to other demographics, creating additional challenges in the digital dating space.

“Profile presentation is no longer optional. It’s the starting point,” said Vincent. “A strong photo set and well-crafted prompts are what determine whether you get seen, matched, and messaged back.”

In addition to in-person shoots, Vincent has built an active presence online through his YouTube channel Based Vincent and Instagram account (@based.vincent). His videos regularly address modern dating struggles, offering commentary on why men struggle with low-quality photos, poor messaging strategies, or lack of confidence. These insights extend the coaching beyond individual clients, reaching thousands of viewers looking for practical dating advice.

What differentiates Vincent from other dating photographers is the integration of coaching with imagery. Traditional dating profile photography often stops at providing professional pictures. Vincent’s process continues into strategy from selecting the right opening lines to understanding how to transition from app conversations to real-world dates. This combined methodology has positioned him as both a dating app photographer and a coach, with services recognized by clients nationwide.

Based Vincent’s online presence has also expanded, with Instagram Reels and YouTube videos that discuss modern dating challenges and strategies. His long-term goal is to further develop services that integrate photography, psychology, and data-driven insights for men navigating online dating.

Recent bookings include shoots in New York City, San Francisco, and Sydney, Australia. His dedicated city pages, such as “NYC Dating App Photographer,” highlight signature locations and provide resources for men looking to book in those regions. More information, including client stories and service details, is available on his website.
