Jabour will present his session, "Building Bridges: Enhancing Workplace Safety for Hispanic Workers in the U.S.", on Monday, September 15, at 2:30 PM in Room 405. "Being invited back to the largest EHS event in the world is an incredible honor," Jabour said. "It shows that saving lives and improving workplace culture transcends borders."

The NSC Safety Congress & Expo has, for over a century, been the premier platform for environment, health, and safety (EHS) innovation. It draws thousands of professionals from around the globe seeking cutting-edge technology, proven products and services, valuable education, and unmatched networking opportunities. This year's event features over 1,000 exhibiting companies on the expo floor — the central hub for collaboration and innovation — as well as structured networking sessions, interactive workshops, and casual meetups that connect attendees with industry leaders and innovators.

Jabour, based in Massachusetts, has trained more than 50,000 workers in person over 15 years. His upcoming talk will address the disproportionately high rate of workplace fatalities among Hispanic workers in the U.S., offering actionable strategies that bridge cultural and language gaps. His presentation blends emotional storytelling — including the loss of his father in a workplace accident when he was six — with practical solutions for companies, supervisors, and safety professionals.

The NSC's decision to feature Jabour again underscores its commitment to diverse perspectives and global expertise in advancing workplace safety. His participation not only highlights his growing influence but also reinforces the event's reputation as the premier stage for the world's most respected safety professionals.
