EINPresswire.com/ -- Efficiency Canada and Energy Conference Network, in partnership with the Low-Income Energy Network and Ishkoday, will host the 2nd Annual Canada Home Energy Justice Conference on October 8–9, 2025, at the John G. Diefenbaker Building in Ottawa. This national event will focus on tackling energy poverty and increasing access to solutions that make homes more affordable, efficient, and healthy.

The conference will again bring together academics, researchers, and professionals who deliver energy efficiency programs to low-income families.

This year's event will serve as a vital platform for policymakers, Indigenous leaders, non-profit organizations, utility providers, academics, and community advocates to share insights, foster partnerships, and develop actionable strategies. Key sessions will focus on the disproportionate impact of high energy costs on vulnerable communities, the role of government policy in promoting energy equity, and innovative technologies and programs designed to improve energy affordability and efficiency.

This conference is about coming together to change that — to share ideas, spark partnerships, and build the policies, programs, and capacity to end energy poverty within a generation.”

Corey Diamond, Executive Director, Efficiency Canada

“Nearly two million households in Canada experience energy poverty, with seniors, renters, newcomers, single-parent families, and rural communities most at risk,” said Corey Diamond, Executive Director, Efficiency Canada.

“This conference is about coming together to change that — to share ideas, spark partnerships, and build the policies, programs, and capacity to end energy poverty within a generation.”
