"We're proud to bring a program to Louisville that allows students to graduate debt-free and ready to step into an essential healthcare role," said Holly Capuano, Program Manager of Louisville Medical Assistant School.

Louisville's newest medical assistant school prepares students to work alongside physicians, nurses, and other healthcare professionals through a curriculum built on practical, hands-on experience. Students complete classroom learning, lab sessions, and an 80-hour externship, gaining valuable training under the guidance of experienced medical providers.

The school's mission is to make high-quality healthcare training accessible while helping students avoid the heavy burden of student debt. Louisville Medical Assistant School offers flexible tuition options, giving students the choice to pay in full, select from pre-set plans, or work with the school to develop a custom payment plan tailored to their needs.

By attending Louisville Medical Assistant School, students gain skills in anatomy and physiology, neurology, healthcare ethics, phlebotomy, and patient care, including intake, vital signs, communication, and medication management. They also train on administrative essentials such as billing and coding, electronic medical records, and office management.

“We’re excited to bring our student-focused model to Louisville,” said Chris Lofton, Chief Executive Officer at Zollege. “By offering hands-on training in real healthcare settings, we’re preparing students to succeed in today’s medical field and helping local employers meet rising workforce demands.”

Graduates of Louisville Medical Assistant School are prepared to pursue employment in outpatient clinics, hospitals, research facilities, and other healthcare organizations across the community.
