

Chloe Hodge, Award-Winning Australian Author, Says Creativity Should Not Be Replaced by AI

Using AI to write books is not only misleading but also undermines the integrity of the literary world, diminishing genuine creativity.

In response to the recent headline, "No consent": Australian authors 'livid' that Meta may have used their books to train AI," Hodge says, "The use of AI to write books is not only misleading, it strips away the authenticity and emotional depth that real authors bring to their work. It diminishes the value of genuine storytelling, undermines the years of dedication writers invest in their craft, and erodes opportunities for the many creative professionals who make books possible."

Hodge further emphasizes that AI threatens more than just the author's voice. "This technology not only undermines authorship but also takes jobs from ghostwriters, editors, book cover designers, and everyone involved in the publishing process. It's an easy way out, and it's especially difficult for indie authors trying to carve out their place in the industry."

Hodge notes that readers today are often skeptical of authors due to the use of AI in writing books, and even something as simple as an end dash can raise eyebrows. While some associate this punctuation with AI-generated writing, Hodge insists it has long been one of her favorite stylistic techniques.
