Why style now meets posture

As organizations refine their hybrid policies and executives split their time between home offices and headquarters, interest has shifted toward seating that performs well for long stretches while presenting a polished profile. Global health authorities identify low back pain as the leading cause of disability worldwide, affecting an estimated 619 million people in 2020, with cases projected to rise to 843 million by 2050, reinforcing the need for supportive seating in knowledge work settings. Industry research also continues to document the persistence of hybrid work in remote-capable roles, sustaining investment in ergonomically mindful, executive-grade chairs.
