Larysa Jaye (1984–2024) was a genre-defying singer-songwriter whose acoustic soul, country, and rock-influenced storytelling earned her a devoted following in Nashville and beyond. In June 2025, during CMA Fest, the City of Nashville officially proclaimed “Larysa Jaye Day” in recognition of her impact, making her one of the few artists to be honored in that way. That proclamation specifically highlighted her role as the only Black women with a downtown Nashville residency at the time and underscored her trailblazing presence in the heart of Music City.

Throughout her career, Larysa shattered barriers. She held a weekly residency at Justin Timberlake's Twelve Thirty Club on Lower Broadway, an area dominated by honky-tonks and touring acts, making her one of the few Black women to maintain a standing gig in downtown Nashville. She also performed regularly at Nashville International Airport (BNA), bringing live music to travelers in transit.

Larysa Jaye turned every stage into a story and every song into a reminder that life itself is a soundtrack made of many songs!"

Larysa's artistic reach extended beyond live shows: she was accepted into the Academy of Country Music's OnRamp program, which supports emerging artists; she collaborated with artists such as Lauren Daigle, Danny Gokey, Carrie Underwood, and Kevin Max; and she served as musical director for Nashville's Shakespeare Festival, showing her versatility in theatre settings.

Her music addressed real themes: identity, motherhood, perseverance, heartbreak, and hope. In the wake of her passing on December 8th, 2024, the loss was felt deeply in Nashville's music community. But her story didn't end, her family and collaborators are committed to extending her voice through new releases, a feature-length documentary, and initiatives that will expand her artistic vision.

"Larysa Jaye was Music's hidden treasure. She had this way of lighting up a room without trying. We just want to make sure her light keeps reaching people. - Carlos (C.M. James) Mcneely. (brother)

"When you lose someone like Larysa, you realize legacy isn't built on time, it's built on impact. She didn't get the years she deserved, but she made every second count."- (Friend)

You don't have to be in Nashville to support this movement. Whether purchasing a ticket or making a donation via larysajaye.com/benefit-concert, you become part of ensuring her legacy endures. Even if you can't attend, your support matters.
