Consumers are tough but loyal, and once they find something they can trust, they stick with it. That's why bringing Dialed In to Massachusetts feels so right.”

For Sun Theory President Matthew Melander, the move to Massachusetts is both professional and personal. A Massachusetts native with deep roots in the community, Melander has already built a successful brand in the state and knows the market well.

“Massachusetts consumers don't compromise on quality,” said Melander. “Consumers are tough but loyal, and once they find something they can trust, they stick with it. That's why bringing Dialed In to Massachusetts feels so right. These gummies are crafted with the same integrity that matters to the people of this state.”

The brand will roll out its core lineup of sativa, indica, hybrid, and sleep formulations, while also introducing seasonal innovations and limited-time collaborations with local cultivators throughout the year. This mix of staples and rotating drops keeps the offerings fresh and consumers engaged—a secret ingredient of Dialed In's success.

“Our classic line gives consumers something they can rely on, while our seasonal and strain-specific collaborations showcase the work of local growers," said Max Vansluys, President of Dialed In Gummies. "It's about lifting up the community and giving people a chance to taste the best of Massachusetts."

Beyond collaborating with cultivators, Dialed In is deeply embedded in Massachusetts' vibrant music and cultural scene. The brand has already partnered with multiple major festivals and events throughout the fall, including the No Hype Fest in Cambridge and Ritual, Boston's wellness social.
