

Gunhill Road Drops Issue-Oriented Music Video Capturing the Noise and Chaos of the Modern Media Era

NEW YORK CITY, NY, UNITED STATES, October 26, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ -- The legendary pop ensemble Gunhill Road, best known for their 1970s hit "Back When My Hair Was Short," has released a striking new single and music video titled "Close My Ears."

True to the band's roots in socially aware songwriting, "Close My Ears" delivers a raw, emotional reflection on living through a crisis-ridden, hyper-connected world — one where nonstop outrage and information overload have become the new normal.

"Too much information clogging up my brain... and I can't change the station; it's driving me insane!" the band cries out in a line that captures the exhaustion of an era defined by constant noise.

Co-written and performed by Steve Goldrich, Paul Reisch, Brian Koonin, and Michael Harrison, the song pairs hard-hitting rock energy with lyrics that cut through partisan clutter to reveal a universal truth: everyone, no matter their politics, feels the weight of relentless media pressure.

The accompanying video — produced by Matthew B. Harrison — blends vivid, fast-paced imagery of exasperated faces and chaotic news streams, painting a portrait of collective fatigue. It poses a question many are secretly asking themselves: is the only escape to disconnect completely?

Gunhill Road's loyal following continues to grow, with the group now boasting nearly half a million combined listens, views, and downloads — powered in part by strong airplay and coverage across talk radio.
