

Tokenized America and the End of Financial Privacy

SAN JUAN, TN, PUERTO RICO, October 31, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ -- The Hard Asset Money Show with Christian Briggs Examines the Global Push Toward Digital Currency

The Hard Asset Money Show hosted by economist and financial commentator Christian Briggs released its July 4, 2025 episode "Tokenized America" examining central bank digital currencies and their impact on financial freedom.

Briggs analyzes how asset tokenization could reshape property ownership and banking converting physical and financial assets into blockchain tokens, raising serious concerns about the balance between technological convenience and individual freedom.

"Tokenization is now being put into place to take assets from your personal bank account to your 401k with $10,000 in it. What they're looking at is tokenization as a new way to store and trade assets," Briggs explained.

This episode examines Ripple's CBDC infrastructure development and advances in biometric payment technology from Apple and Neuralink. These systems could enable centralized oversight of global financial flows. Briggs explains how artificial intelligence and blockchain governance could create a future where every transaction is monitored.

Briggs warns that while digital assets offer efficiency they also introduce profound risks if not properly constrained by law and transparency.

The final segment outlines steps for safeguarding wealth and privacy. Briggs emphasizes diversification into hard assets and maintaining access to non-digital stores of value.
