

Christian Briggs Discusses U.S. Trade and Energy Strategy and Its Economic Outlook

SAN JUAN, PUERTO RICO, November 7, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ -- The Hard Asset Money Show with Christian Briggs Analyzes the Economic Impact of the Largest U.S.–Europe Trade Agreement in History

On The July 28, 2025 episode Economist Christian Briggs joins News Today to break down President Trump's historic $2 trillion trade deal with Europe, calling it the most consequential agreement yet.

At the time of the episode's release, the landmark accord outlined $750 billion in American energy exports paired with $600 billion in foreign investment directed toward U.S. infrastructure, manufacturing, and clean energy projects. Briggs explains how this framework is designed to stimulate domestic production, reduce European dependency on Russian energy, and generate sustainable employment across multiple industries.

"I think it's going to be a trillion dollar win", said Briggs. "Not just from the selling of the product, but from the direct investments over the next 3 to 5 years."

Briggs details how the policy could add over 200,000 new high-wage jobs through expanded LNG terminal construction, transportation upgrades, and advanced manufacturing initiatives. The episode also addresses macroeconomic outcomes, including projected GDP growth, supply chain resilience, and strengthened U.S. leverage in global energy markets.

The discussion highlights how the deal's structure enhances American competitiveness while reinforcing strategic independence from adversarial energy suppliers. Briggs characterizes the move as a calculated economic and geopolitical masterstroke that will bolster U.S. industrial strength and long-term prosperity.
