

Tariffs, Short-Term Pain, Long-Term Gain: Christian Briggs on Trump's Trade Gamble

SAN JUAN, PUERTO RICO, November 14, 2025 /EINPresswire.com/ -- The Hard Asset Money Show Explores How Tariff Strategy Could Redefine U.S. Economic Strength

The August 8, 2025 episode of The Hard Asset Money Show features economist and financial commentator Christian Briggs analyzing President Donald Trump's newly implemented tariff strategy and its broader economic implications.

At the time of the episode's release, new tariffs on imported goods had prompted immediate market reactions and public debate over inflationary pressures. Briggs examines how these near-term costs could serve a larger purpose, positioning the policy as a recalibration of global trade designed to strengthen American industry, investment, and consumer prosperity.

"It is a short-term pain, but it will be a substantially long-term gain for the American people," said Briggs. "here will be some sacrifices, but Trump just came out in the last couple weeks talking about lowering taxes or even eliminating taxes on people making somewhere between 150 and 200 thousand [dollars] a year."

Briggs outlines how the administration's negotiations with China and other trading partners aim to secure more equitable trade terms while stimulating internal investment. He also discusses the broader fiscal agenda accompanying the policy, including proposed retirement account reforms projected to inject as much as $12 trillion into the economy and potential tax relief for middle-income households.

According to Briggs, Americans could begin to see the benefits of these combined measures within six to twelve months, with more visible economic impact unfolding over the following year and a half as trade deals mature and domestic capital investment expands.
