What Are The Major Factors Driving The Evaporated Goat Milk Global Market Growth?

The increasing number of people who are lactose intolerant is anticipated to spur the expansion of the evaporated goat milk industry. Lactose intolerance is a health condition where an individual cannot completely process lactose, a compound present in milk and dairy goods, due to low levels of lactase, the enzyme tasked with lactose decomposition in the small intestine. Goat milk contains lipid molecules smaller than those in cow milk, thus people with weak digestion like those who are lactose intolerant find it easier to process. For example, the 2023 World Population Review report, a worldwide population project of the US Census Bureau, estimated that around 65% of the global population are lactose-intolerant, with 70-100% of East Asians, 100% of Ghanaians, 100% of South Koreans, and 98% of Vietnamese depicting the highest prevalence of lactose intolerance. Hence, the expanding demographic of lactose-intolerant people is catalyzing the growth of the evaporated goat milk market.

In the evaporated goat milk sector, leading businesses are concentrating on the creation of novel solutions such as milk powder to increase product longevity, boost nutritional content, and fulfil the increasing demand for convenient and nutritious dairy substitutes. For example, Karnlea, an Ireland-based pet nutrition firm, unveiled Goat Milk Plus, a new product in August 2024. This product amalgamates prebiotics, probiotics, and postbiotics to bolster pets' gut health and immune system.
