EINPresswire.com/ -- Winter Termite Activity: Why Inspections Still Matter in the Cold Months

By Universal Pest & Termite – Your Local Termite Experts

When temperatures drop in Hampton Roads, most homeowners assume pests disappear until spring. While some insects do slow down during cold weather, termites are not one of them. These destructive invaders remain active year-round — including in the dead of winter — making seasonal termite inspections critical to protecting your home.

Why Termites Stay Active in Winter

Unlike pests that live outdoors and go dormant, subterranean termites build colonies deep underground or within warm, insulated structures like crawl spaces and wall voids. These environments allow them to:

- Maintain access to heat and moisture
- Continue feeding on structural wood
- Avoid freezing temperatures
- Stay hidden from homeowners

Termites Cost Money

In our local climate — Virginia Beach, Chesapeake, Newport News, Norfolk, Suffolk, Williamsburg, Hampton, and the surrounding areas — ground temperatures rarely get cold enough to slow termites down. Heated homes and moisture-rich crawl spaces create the perfect year-round habitat.

The Silent Winter Destroyer

Winter is actually when termite damage can become more aggressive, because:

- Home heating dries out wood, making it easier to chew through
- Moisture buildup under homes remains during colder months
- Homeowners are less likely to notice signs of activity
- Swarming season is months away, so visual clues are limited
